Not illustrated. 1913 Excerpt: .remains invariant, then $p-p = 2i2p-p$; whence it is obvious that $pp = 0$. In general: The inner product of any singular vector by itself is zero, and this suffices to characterize a singular vector. Hence rr reduces to $r-r = 2xy$ $p-q$. Before proceeding further with the definition of the inner product, we may observe that the signs of x and y are determined by that one of the four angles (made by the fixed lines) in which r lies. According, then, as x and y have the same sign or different signs, the vector r belongs to one or the other of the classes (7) or (8), and the product $r-r$ will have one sign or the other. These considerations suffice to show that if r and r are two vectors, and if $r-r$ and $r-r$ have the same sign, the vectors are of the same class, but if $r-r$ and $r-r$ are of opposite sign, r and r are of different classes. We have here a marked departure from Euclidean geometry, in which the inner product of a real vector by itself is always positive. We are now in a position to complete the definition of the inner product by stating that the product is a scalar, and that the product of a vector by itself is equal to the square of the interval of the vector, taken positively if the vector is of class (7), negatively if of class (5). This...
