Not illustrated. 1885 Excerpt: .Our business done, we took our way slowly homeward through the summer weather. The mourner was gone. But as we neared the old elm that threw its shade over the seats upon the village green, we discerned a group of rustics silently drinking in the homely words of Old Solomon, who was giving them his earnest talk anent this great farmer and his solitary son. We drew near, and respectfully heeded the old man s sermon. My friends, he began, if I go on this road I shall soon be as great a preacher as the pa son hisself, though I do preach outside, and he do preach inside. But it s your own fault. I should never do it if you didn t push me to it by saying over almost everything as happens in the parish: What do you think about it, Solomon? So I just tells you what I do think; only, of one thing I be very sure, and that is that all I says to you, I says it in love. Now, about this ugly business we ve seen today. It made my heart ache, and set me thinking a goodish bit; and, if you will have it, this is the outshot of my cogitatings. Mind how you do deal with the youngsters. I ve got a strongish habit of taking the words in the Big Book to mean what they do say. And when it says: Train up a child...
