Brand New Book. Excerpt from Measurement of Energy Irradiance From Single Pulse Sources In this paper we describe a method for measuring the amount of energy per unit area, or energy irradiance propagating from a pulsed source such as a xenon flashtube at a given distance from the source. The basic measurement procedure is applicable when the energy is either to be measured spectrally (per unit wavelength) or to be integrated over a spectral bandwidth, such as in the case of photopic (luminous) energy. The latter measurement was performed as a special calibration by nbs. While preparing for this calibration, it was realized that little previous documentation existed concerning this type of measurement. Since there is an apparent need for such measurements, this paper is being written to document the procedure we have used at nbs. We will present a specific method of calibrating the energy per unit area of a pulsed source using a continuous (non - pulsed) standard of either irradiance or illuminance (luminous intensity). The theoretical approach will be outlined, followed by a detailed discussion of the factors contributing to the uncertainty of the measurement. As a specific example, we will describe the particular measurement performed at nbs. Finally, we will conclude with a discussion of the treatment of the data, the curve fitting and its inherent problems.
