Excerpt from The Manhattan; An Illustrated Monthly Magazine: July, 1883 The history of a college, like that of a nation, is something more and better than a catalogue of famous names, a narrative of startling achievements, a record of architectural growth and pecuniary acquisitions. It is the story of an organic life, unfolding itself from an ideal germ, controlled by fixed principles, and conditioned by a certain environment. A great institution of learning has an individual and personal character. It is not a chance aggregation of men and buildings, but an organism, and before we can really understand its nature or its history we must know its vital spirit and the law of its development. This is especially true of Princeton College. You cannot understand its position and its growth, you cannot get a right conception of its character and the work that it has done, unless you know the idea in which it had its birth, and which has always guided its career. This idea was the necessary union of true religion and sound learning. The founders of the college,...
