Never theless, whilst it is given to the few to survey the problems of existence with that broad and responsive comprehension which has characterized the work of some of our greatest intellects, those of a lesser versatility may derive some comfort from the hope that their efforts to study one small point of interest may at least help to furnish a pebble towards the great fabric of truth which is arising out of the conceptions of the master architects of science. At the present time, when evolution is as much the basis of biological investigation as is the law of gravity of astronomical research, the study of mimicry has assumed a position of no little importance. Whilst the phenomenon...
