Not illustrated. 1916 Excerpt: .division of the work by sections is of the utmost importance, and it is recommended that each section be considered as a subcontract and the material and payroll costs distributed accordingly. In other words, instead of carrying a job as a complete whole, we divide the total into sections in accordance with the original Outline of Work, and Itemized Estimate, and maintain a separate account for each section so that we have distinct time and work reports and separate distribution sheets. By adopting this method, the work of the field forces and of the office are harmoniously adjusted and the work of the cost analysis at the completion of the contract is very much simplified. Cost-Analysis Progress and Final Charts We will next take up the question of the analysis of the result as shown by the field and office bookkeeping system, with the idea of using progress estimates and progress charts. Value of Progress Study. Analytical progress study is not only intensely interesting but is of the greatest importance to the up-to-date superintendent, inasmuch as, through the information furnished by the proper recording of the results of the work, he is able to discover the weak points and to direct his best attention to them instead of considering the whole work. Without such detailed information the superintendent is absolutely at a loss to prepare any record; he may be intelligent enough to recognize that certain parts of the work are not proceeding properly, but he...
