Excerpt from The New Club House of the Engineers Club: Being a Preliminary Description of the Plans and Details Entrance to the clubhouse is effected through a small but commodious vestibule, by which access is gained to the hall or foyer. On the left is the reception room for strangers; on the right is the writing room for members, fitted up with writing tables, mail boxes, etc. Adjacent is the Administration office, and across the hall is the capacious coat room, equal to the care of no fewer than five hundred coats and hats. Passing along the hall to the center of the house, one comes to the grand main stairway, which leads up from the right-hand side to the third floor. At the end of the hall is a large, quaintly artistic cafe with a grille. A bar, cigar stand, four telephone booths, and a small lavatory are also provided on this floor. On the left of the foyer hall, are the service stairs and three electric elevators. The three elevators run from basement to roof, as well as the service stairs. One of these elevators is intended for freight, but may also be used for passengers if necessary. The main lavatory is in the basement at the foot of the main stairs. On the second story is the large clubroom at the front of the building, and the library is at the rear. Both rooms are of stately proportions and appropriately equipped. Service from the bar on the first floor, is obtained from an electric dumb-waiter near the service stairs, which also runs to the billiard-room floor above. The billiard room is large enough to accommodate six tables, and...
