The vigilance required to prevent sanitary stores in transit from falling into unprincipled hands is fully illustrated in a mishap which occurred to Mrs. McKay in the summer of 1833. At Washington she had packed a box containing a large number of articles, useful for her own mess and for preparing special diet, and some choice liquors. Having obtained transportation, it was put on the same train of cars on which she herself took passage. At the last station before reaching Sulphur Springs, Virginia, her destination, she inquired for her box, and was told that the baggage train had stopped several miles back, at Warrenton Junction; it had not come, but would be there the next day. She went on to General Birney s headquarters,...
