Excerpt from Evolution, Vol. 4: A Journal of Nature; January, 1938 But we know that heritable variations, or mutations, do occur in nature. The young are not always like the old. A great many instances have been observed where new characteristics have come into being. Such mutations occur when something has happened to the genes, causing them to transmit to posterity a message different from that received from their ancestors. Plant and animal breeders are constantly on the lookout for suitable mutations with which to breed up seed and stock. How to affect the genes and cause mutations artificially and thus speed up evolution is a problem that has challenged the attention of scientists for a long time. In Volume III, Number 1 of evolution, Dr. H. Mueller described a method for bringing this about by means of X-rays. Scientists in many Agricultural Colleges are now experimenting on various plants with this method. Dr. Blakeslee experimented along a different line. He tried out the effect of various chemicals in his effort to induce hereditary mutations. And he found that a chemical, colchicine, would cause mutations in plants, doubling the chromosomes and genes, (distinguished from mutations due to changes within the genes).
