They stated to me many practical grievances, one of which was that a member of their persuasion was then in prison for a contempt of the Court of Chancery, because he could not, according to his tenets, put in his answer upon oath. I introduced a Bill to relieve them, and after a deal of tedious and vexatious opposition succeeded in getting it passed to the Lords. One of its opponents in the House of Commons was my esteemed friend, Mr Goulburn, who afterwards shewed his great financial judgment as Chancellor of the Exchequer. He objected to granting a privilege to so small a sect to save them from the consequences of their own perverseness. I answered that the advantage was not merely to the witness, and asked if my Right Hon. friend was a party...
