The men had aroused from the lethargy caused by the heat, and were standing around in groups, discussing the strange occurrence. They were conscious that something mysterious was happening. The great vessel lay motionless, rising and falling slowly on the long surges. It took half an hour to make the inspection I had ordered. During this time I looked things over carefully myself, but could find no explanation of the trouble. I returned to the bridge and awaited the report of my officers. In a few moments the chief-engineer joined me. Well? I can find nothing wrong, sir. The boilers and machinery seem to be in as good, if not better, condition than when we sailed. Put on forced drafts, and see if you can t get steam enough to start her. And he went below. I waited impatiently for some movement. I listened intently for the first throb of the screw. Minutes dragged by, and a half an hour passed, but no sound broke the stillness. Volumes of smoke, shot with flame and spark, tumbled from the funnels, showing that the fires were working well, but the screw did not revolve. to Be Cont1nued. BY FREDERICK MYRON COLBY. From a height the king hath seen, In the valley broad and green, Bordering on a silver tide, Ethelbald s affianced bride. Rode his gray steed down the hill, Urged by all a lover s will. Listen to...
