Personal Experiences, Observations, and Studies in Japan, 1870-1874; Book III. Supplementary Chapters, Including History to the Beginning of 1912 The meeting of steamers in mid-ocean is, strange to say, a matter of dislike to a certain class of persons, who, in spite Of all preventive pre cautions, keep up their existence. One or two stowaways are found on nearly every steamer that leaves the shores of either continent. They sneak on board the big ship while in port, and are driven from their lair, when at sea, by hunger. When first discovered, the inquisi tor of the ship - the purser - uses all his skill to extort the full passage money. If not forthcoming, the stowaway is consigned to purga tory - i. E., the fire-room, and compelled to pass coal and feed the fires. This process refines his feelings so far that the dross is produced, if on the victim s person. If he refuses to do duty, his fare being still unpaid, he is put in irons, but...
