Not illustrated. 1872 Excerpt: . . . CHAPTER XIV. Towards the close of August Fernlea was quite deserted. Lord and Lady Mount Alton had gone with their daughter to the Goodwood races, and Lyffton was with a friend cruising off the French coast in his yacht. Meanwhile the Stangraves were staying at a little seaside village in Brittany, where they had taken a country house near the Chateau de Ronceveaux, where lived some relatives of Lady Margaret. The village was a simple out-of-the-way place, standing in the shelter of a curving bay, girt with gray weather-stained cliffs; a quiet place, where the men spread the sails of their boats, and plied their oars day after day; where the women sat on their door-steps mending nets and spinning, or else stood gossiping round the well. Many would have felt very dull there; but Agnes did not. She had the companionship of the young De Ronceveaux, her relatives, and, what she liked almost better, she could ramble over the cliffs and in the fields by herself, and notice the quaint oldworld ways of the good people. But her special delight was in the children; the little creatures were won from the first by her sweet face, and would half court, half shrink from her notice; but from the moment her voice had sounded in their ears, once they had heard her sing in church, they were irresistibly drawn towards her, and would follow her about, whenever she appeared in the village, with timid...
