Excerpt: . . . rushing over the milldam, and the hylodes are peeping faintly. Daylight did not show even an early bee, though for a week wood has been sawed in a sunny spot and the sweet dust lies scattered on the ground; but through the night, from the warm southeast, where the sun first touches the fields that run to the marshes, where there are old matted reeds, comes the welcome peep! peep! peep! As the days lengthen, from afternoon till dawn you hear the marsh frogs chorus; it is not musical and would be little prized at any other season. Surely the hylodes, more than the larger frogs, inspired Aristophanes by their ceaselessness: --In their yearly revelry, Brekeke--kesh, ko-ash, ko-ash! But this croaking makes the blood flow quicker; it is the vocal spring sign of animal nature, even though the fox and owl may breed in...
